To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing in strong support of SterileZone Guardian, an AI-powered sterile field monitoring system developed by Suhas Chinta and his team at Keller Collegiate Academy.

Having reviewed the technical and clinical documentation accompanying this project, I am impressed by both the rigor of the team's approach and the genuine clinical relevance of the problem they are addressing. Surgical site infections remain a significant and largely preventable burden on the healthcare system, and the absence of any automated, objective monitoring solution in current clinical practice represents a meaningful gap. SterileZone Guardian addresses this gap directly.

The system's core capabilities — real-time boundary breach detection at greater than 99% accuracy, sub-100-millisecond response latency, millisecond-accurate event logging, and a self-contained hardware form factor requiring no network dependency or workflow disruption — reflect a level of technical and clinical thinking that is exceptional for any innovator, and particularly remarkable for a student team.

From a clinical standpoint, I find the event logging capability to be among the most compelling features of this system. The ability to generate a permanent, auditable compliance record of sterile field activity addresses a long-standing limitation in both quality assurance and training environments, where accountability has historically depended entirely on real-time human observation.

I endorse SterileZone Guardian as a clinically meaningful, technically sound innovation with a credible development roadmap and genuine potential for impact across operating rooms, simulation laboratories, and sterile manufacturing environments. I commend Suhas and his team for the seriousness and professionalism with which they have pursued this work, and I wish them every success at HOSA Medical Innovation Internationals.

Please do not hesitate to contact me should you require any further information.

Sincerely,

Dr. Vikaskumar Patel
